
Roper struck down the death penalty for children. Graham struck down life without parole for children who commit non-homicide offenses, requiring a meaningful opportunity to obtain release. Miller required sentencing judges to consider the mitigating attributes of youth before a child charged with homicide can be sentenced to life without parole—and Montgomery applied Miller retroactively.

In the Supreme Court’s most recent decision in Jones, the Court declined to adopt additional procedural protections for children facing life without parole, but it affirmed Miller and Montgomery and the core constitutional proposition that “youth matters in sentencing.” Moreover, the Court in Jones made clear that state legislatures and Congress are empowered to enact legislation that bans life without parole for children.
Ten years since Miller

A majority of the 2,800 individuals serving juvenile life without parole (JLWOP) following Miller have been resentenced in court or had their sentences amended via legislation, depending on the jurisdiction in which they were convicted.

Yet despite the over 80 percent reduction in people serving JLWOP, jurisdictions have varied significantly in their implementation of Miller. As a result, relief afforded to individuals serving JLWOP is based more on jurisdiction than on whether the individual has demonstrated positive growth and maturation.

The uneven implementation of Miller disproportionately impacts Black individuals, who represent 61 percent of the total JLWOP population.

The chart below reflects the current status of the approximately 2,800 people serving JLWOP when Montgomery was decided. Within that population, 31 percent have been released, over 50 percent have had their sentences reduced from JLWOP, about 15 percent have not yet been afforded relief, and approximately 3 percent have been resentenced to JLWOP.

Fast facts

880
Over 880 people originally sentenced to JLWOP have been released since Montgomery, including over 100 since Jones.

32
32 states now ban JLWOP or have no one serving the sentence.

80%
The national JLWOP population has been reduced by over 80 percent in five years.

61%
Sixty-one percent of children sentenced to JLWOP pre-Miller are Black, and the proportion of Black children sentenced to JLWOP has increased in new cases post-Miller.

Data on file at the Campaign for the Fair Sentencing of Youth
In the ten years since Miller was decided in June 2012, the United States has experienced sweeping change in the practice of sentencing children to die in prison. When Miller was decided, 45 states and the District of Columbia permitted life without parole as a sentencing option for children. In many states, life without parole was the only sentence available if a child was convicted of homicide.

Remarkably, the number of states that do not allow life without parole to be imposed on children has quintupled since 2012, from five states to twenty-five states and the District of Columbia. And in at least seven additional states, no one is serving the sentence for an offense committed as a child. Today a majority of states ban life without parole for children or have no one serving the sentence.

!Rapid state-level rejection of life without parole for children